A group of Cincinnati mothers and families hopes that by remembering their murdered loved ones, they'll encourage more witnesses to step forward.

A few from the "Who Killed Our Kids?" group gathered Wednesday in Walnut Hills on the sidewalk where Gino Booker was shot and killed in 2002.

Mothers in the group place flowers and pictures on Booker's memorial to remind the community that police detectives can't solve neighborhood murders alone.

"We need people to tell," said Michelle Baskin, a member of the group.

"If you see something," said Baskin, "tell it."

"We need to know. It could be your family next, you know what I'm saying? It's happening so much, everyday, all day," Baskin said. "Somebody come and speak up."

The Cincinnati police homicide unit helped to bring the mothers and families together and within a few weeks the "Who Killed Our Kids?" group has grown to include almost 70 families.
